Objectives: India's rising international status is termed differently, that ranges from a developing country to an emerging superpower. This position is narrated in comparison to other countries. In this regard, the rise of China, though claimed by Beijing as a peaceful development, is considered as a security threat by the countries in the region. Resultantly, major countries like India, Japan, Australia, Singapore, and South Korea, Philippines, Indonesia, Vietnam and others have either strengthened their alliance or partnership with the US or they have entered in bilateral or multilateral security and strategic arrangements. These developments have inflected India to a prominent position in the Indian Ocean region that is why a new strategic construct has evolved in the form of Indo-Pacific. Moreover, India's development of a credible deterrence and its ambition of a blue-water navy has made other countries in the Indo-Pacific region to consider New Delhi as a port in the storm. This new dynamics offers several opportunities for India to play an enhanced role to shift the balance of power.

Sub-themes:

- Indo-Pacific geo-strategic construct
- Evolving power dynamics in the Indo-Pacific region
- India's national interest and strategic imperatives
- Prospects for India to play a vital role in the shifting balance of power
- Security and strategic challenges for India.
